

An Inventive Shed Man

An Inventive Shed Man

JOHN DANNATT
1918 ~ 2014

Dannatt family tree

Early days in Essex

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought Germany would want to take this strategic port on Africa's west coast for itself. As it turned out they were not attacked, so they had 6 months living in this peaceful area to practice driving their Bren gun carriers and other vehicles and perform whatever mock war scenarios their commanding officers could come up with. This gave them a fair amount of time to look around and appreciate the place they were in. John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought Germany would want to take this strategic port on Africa's west coast for itself. As it turned out they were not attacked, so they had 6 months living in this peaceful area to practice driving their Bren gun carriers and other vehicles and perform whatever mock war scenarios their commanding officers could come up with.

Grandad

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John had a wallet beautifully made of alligator skin with decoration of simple lines tooled into the leather. The man who made it, worked from a basic hut sitting on the floor with very little paraphernalia which impressed John as he appreciated good craftsmanship. John kept and used that wallet for the rest of his life.

Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought.

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John had a wallet beautifully made of alligator skin with decoration of simple lines tooled into the leather. The man who made it, worked from a basic hut sitting on the floor with very

'Hyde Hall', the family home in Essex. ca 1930

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John had a wallet beautifully made of alligator skin with decoration of simple lines tooled into the leather. The man who made it, worked from a basic hut sitting on the floor with very little paraphernalia which impressed John as he appreciated good craftsmanship. John kept and used that wallet for the rest of his life.

Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought.

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John had a wallet beautifully made of alligator skin with decoration of simple lines tooled into the leather. The man who made it, worked from a basic hut sitting on the floor with very little paraphernalia which impressed John as he appreciated good craftsmanship. John kept and used that wallet for the rest of his life.

Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

School Days

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought Germany would want to take this strategic port on Africa's west coast for itself. As it turned out they were not attacked, so they had 6 months living in this peaceful area to practice driving their Bren gun carriers and other vehicles and perform whatever mock war scenarios their commanding officers could come up with. This gave them a fair amount of time to look around and appreciate the place they were in.

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John had a wallet beautifully made of alligator skin with decoration of simple lines tooled into the leather. The man who made it, worked from a basic hut sitting on the floor with very little paraphernalia which impressed John as he appreciated good craftsmanship. John kept and used that wallet for the rest of his life. Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

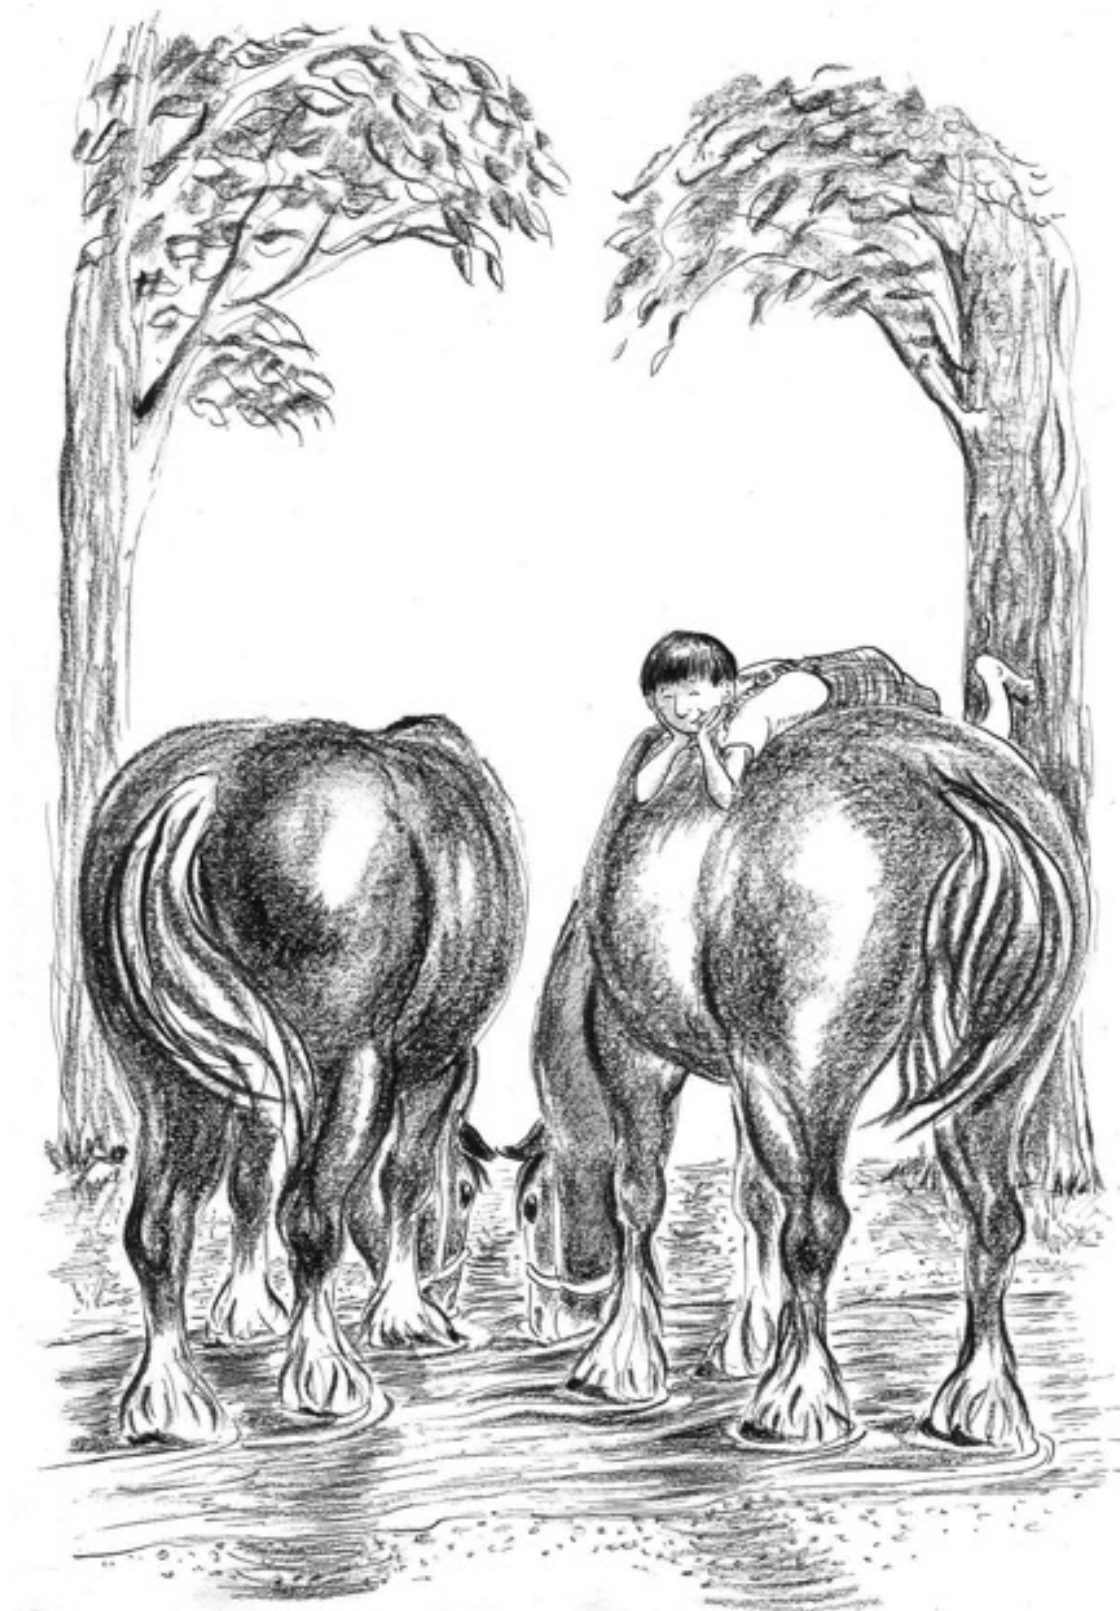

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought.

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John had a wallet beautifully made of alligator skin with decoration of simple lines tooled into the leather. The man who made it, worked from a basic hut sitting on the floor with very little paraphernalia which impressed John as he appreciated good craftsmanship. John kept and used that wallet for the rest of his life.

Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought.

The War years 1939–1945

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought Germany would want to take this strategic port on Africa's west coast for itself. As it turned out they were not attacked, so they had 6 months living in this peaceful area to practice driving their Bren gun carriers and other vehicles and perform whatever mock war scenarios their commanding officers could come up with. This gave them a fair amount of time to look around and appreciate the place they were in.

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John had a wallet beautifully made of alligator skin with decoration of simple lines tooled into the leather. The man who made it, worked from a basic hut sitting on the floor with very little paraphernalia which impressed John as he appreciated good craftsmanship. John kept and used that wallet for the rest of his life.

Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought Germany would want to take this strategic port on Africa's west coast for itself. As it turned out they were not attacked, so they had 6 months living in this peaceful area to practice driving their Bren gun carriers and other vehicles and perform whatever mock war scenarios their commanding officers could come up with. This gave them a fair amount of time to look around and appreciate the place they were in.

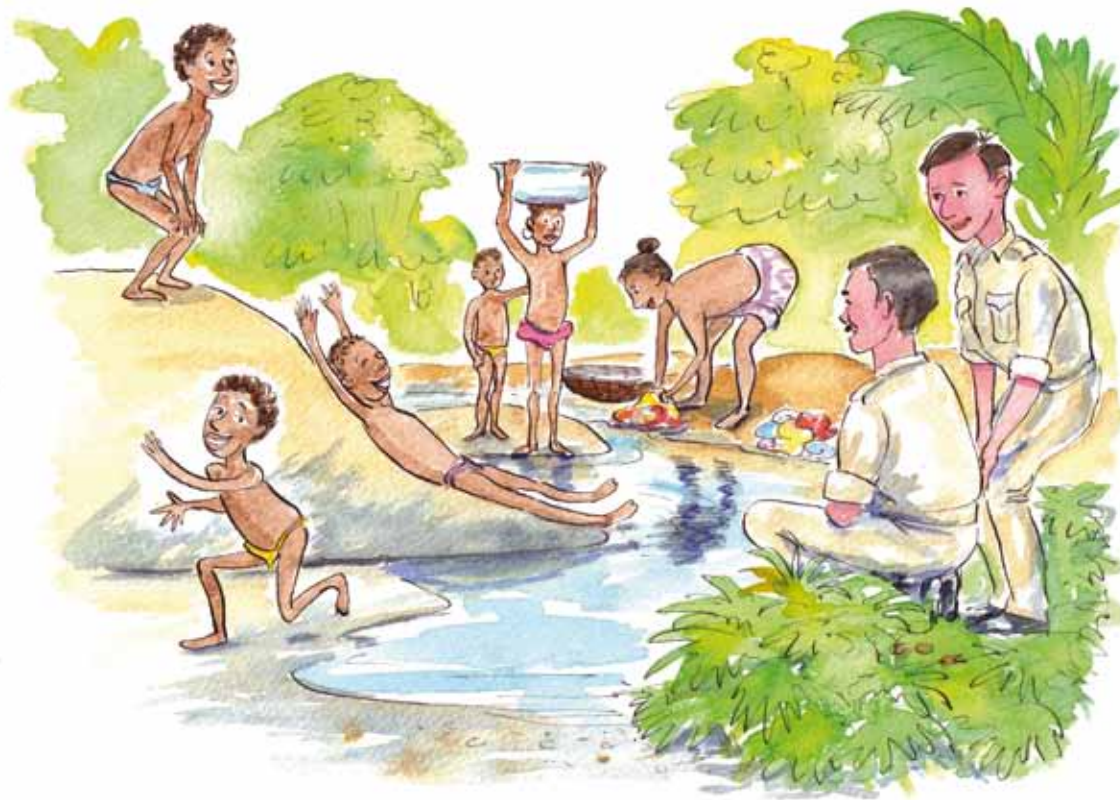

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture. Throughout his life he collected and read books about other cultures particularly South Sea Islands and I think Sierra Leone was the start of that interest.

John had a wallet beautifully made of alligator skin with decoration of simple lines tooled into the leather. The man who made it, worked from a basic hut sitting on the floor with very little paraphernalia which impressed John as he appreciated good craftsmanship. John kept and used that wallet for the rest of his life.

Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

Later in the war when in the Western Desert to avoid possible encounters with snakes which John always hated, he rigged up a hammock in the Bren gun carrier. One morning he was woken by a curious camel sniffing at him and he woke up with a start right into the nose of the camel!

John was sent to Sierra Leone as part of the 161st Brigade of the Essex Territorial Army in January 1941. They arrived in Freetown, their job there was to protect it from attack as it was thought Germany would want to take this strategic port on Africa's west coast for itself. As it turned out they were not attacked, so they had 6 months living in this peaceful area to practice driving their Bren gun carriers and other vehicles and perform whatever mock war scenarios their commanding officers could come up with. This gave them a fair amount of time to look around and appreciate the place they were in.

John's good friend Charlie, a sergeant and person good at picking up languages, was his companion in these adventures. John enjoyed the more relaxed lifestyle in Africa and seeing women washing clothes and children playing in the waterways gave him an insight into this more relaxed culture.

